SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1916.

Mr. Redmond's Speech.

In reading it we must remember always that it was made by the leader of an Irish party at a most critical time in the history of Ireland, England, and the whole Empire. We may summarise the Nationalist Party's new or revised policy in a sentence. It is a declaration of war on the Government in the field of domestic on the Government in the field of domestic politics, and a refusal to mobilise Ireland's man-power in aid of Ireland's and England's war. Mr. Redmond says that the Nationalist Party's political attitude to the British Government will now be one of open and vigorous opposition. In other words, disaffection in Ireland is to be placated by obstruction in the House of Commons. The Nationalist Party still wants England to win the war, but it is only a pious aspiration. We do not gather that it intends to lift a finger to help the frish regiments. Mr. Redmond denounces conscription. It would be an insane policy, he says, and cruits to the Colours since the rebellion.

Mr. Redmond is corscious, however, that this contribution is hardly adequate. He admits that Iseland will be disgraced if she leaves her gallant regiments in the lurch. He suggests, like his official conditions, one of which is the dropping of martial law. Mr. Redmond is ungrateful, for martial law was probably the prime factor in his peaceful reception at Waterford.

a copy, and has protested that they constitute a violation of its treaty rights. The attitude of the United States towards this situation is indicated in a cautious leading article in the New York Times. It imports the Council to-day, and was, no doubt, able to give his colleagues his impressions of Ministry will make no difference in the friendship between the two countries; but it regards the time as inopportune for regards the fime as inopportune for regards the fime as inopportune for regards the fime as inopportune for regards the Californian question, because, Japan is told "in all frankness," there at Waterford.

"touch and go." Mr. Redmond says that the demand for conscription in Ireland is part of a political intrigue to discredit Home Rule. He does a grave in the constraint of the Home Rule. He does a grave injustice to Irish Unionists. If their motives in this matter were merely political, they would rejoice at the present complete breakdown of Nationalist statesmanship. At this moment Mr. Redmond is leading the Home Rule cause straight to destruction. If Irish Unionists were nothing more than politicians, they would speed him down the slope with ill-concealed delight. They are Irishmen first, however, and they refuse to bu political victory at the cost of their country's fame and honour. We ask once more—we ask with a heavier heart than ever after Mr. Redmond's speech—what is to be the fate of our Irish regiments of our national traditions of brotherhood and chivalry, of our reputation in the eyes of embattled Europe? Nine months ago Mr. Redmond said in the House of Commons that he would accept conscrip-tion if he became convinced that it was tion if he became convinced that it was "necessary to the very life of the country." How much conviction does he need? What will convince him if the indignation of the whole British democracy, the yawning gaps in the Irish regiments, and the complete failure of recruiting in Ireland do not even inspire him with a passionate appeal to Irishmen to save their motherland from dishonour?

Mr. Redmond's choice of the twentyfifth anniversary of Mr. Parnell's death for the date of his visit to Waterford signified, perhaps, his recognition of the gravity of the moment.
To-day the Nationalist Party is discredited
in Ireland; the constitutional movement has received a heavy blow; the sympathies of the British democracy, which must be the final arbiter of the Home Rule question, have been estranged. If this sorry state of affairs is to be remedied, it must be remedied by bold, prompt, and statesmanlike action. Ireland and the Kingdom awaited Mr. Redmond's declaration of policy with annious interest. It manlike action. Ireland and the Kingdom awaited Mr. Redmond's declaration of policy with anxious interest. It is before the public this morning. In reading it we must remember always that it was made by the leader of an Irish party at a most critical time in the removal of these restrictions. The late Japanese Premier was unwilling to press the question with the United States Government. Marshal Terauchi, on the other hand, is believed to favour a more vigorous policy. He is certainly a believer in a more "forward" policy in China. He has taken office on the morrow of the announcement of a contract, made between the Chinese Government and an American syndicate, for the construction of fifteen hundred miles of railway in China, and the extension of American

He tells us that, in spite of all them. Their text has been kept several the supplicities and blunders of the last as was done in 1915; but the United months, Ireland has sent 6,000 restored to the Colours since the rebellion. It compared is conscious, however, that

We must, alas! give up the idea that a river service on the Liffey can give us any delights to compare with those of the Seine, so long as our quays are so ugly. Such a service might become the popular way of getting to the Phoenix Park—when there was enough water in the channel—but the banks of the lower Liffey at present are not designed to give visitors a good impression of Dublin as Some day, if the town-planners get their way, Dublin may be a little more like Paris. At present that is a dream, and the Metal Bridge is a fact.

It would be pleasant to think that we were going to have in Dublin a service which would fill the same offices of pleasure and usefulness. An alternative to the quay way from Butt Bridge to the North Wall on the one side, and to the dreary line of Brunswick street to Ringsend on the other, would be appreciated by many persons whose business takes them in either direction. We must, alas! give up the idea that a river in the death of overcome other considerations, or he may have argued that, if he could get a unanimous report out of each a ceregogneous body as this, it would be asy to get the subsequent legislation through the Houses of Parliament. Lord Bryce's Committee of the Armenian atrocities is expected to present its report when Parliament meets next week. It is said that this report will demonstrate that the number of Armenians murdered by the Turks since the war began is not fewer than half a million, and that the number forced from their homes and country is about one million. These figures do not represent, however, the full and terrible total of the tragedies enacted throughout Armenia and Anatolia, and the death-rate daily is heavy. Unless relief can be conveyed speedily to these unfortunate people the deaths will increase, for starvation is rife.

The Prime Minister has asked for a simple banquet at the Guildhall on Lord Mayor's Day, and the question in what auch a hanquet should consist is now puzzling the City Fathers greatly. They have been so used to prodigality of food and display that they scarcely know where to begin to economise. The furthe soup, the baron of beef, and port wine jellies will probably be retained, since they are hall-marked by tradition, and three courses are thus provided. With the addition of some fish the banquet should satisfy any-body.

MR. REDMOND'S SPEECH. In his speech at Waterford, says The Tin

Mr. Redmond said very much what he was expected to say. We appreciate the patriotic and conciliatory tone in which he deals with both the military and the political problem, and though his pronouncements do not carry us much mearer a solution, they make some points clearer. The most important thing he said was that voluntary recruiting was not dead in Ireland. Taken in conjunction with his declaration of Ireland's attitude towards the war, and his condemnation of compulsory service, this statement is in effect an acceptance of responsibility for making voluntary recruiting successful. The most urgent need of the moment is manpower for the Army, and Ireland is one of the three potential sources of supply. Ireland is a particularly valuable reservoir of manpower for the Army, because of the fighting quality of Irishmen, which has been gloriously displayed in the war, and it has been less completely drawn upon than the rest of the United Kingdom. Now all Irishmen of military age and fitness who can be spared are, or will be, needed for the Army. The question is, what is the best way to get the men? We have expressed our ewn opinion, which is that the common obligation now imposed on the rest of the Kingdom should be extended to Ireland, but we have no wish to press it unduly at the present moment. Mr. Redmond says that voluntary recruiting is not dead, that compulsion would be the most fatal thing that could happen, and that it would produce no more then than the voluntary sysfatal thing that could happen, and that it would produce no more then than the voluntary system. We will not argue the question with him. declarations to ask him to prove his words true

IRELAND AND THE EMPIRE.

"Empire First" writes to The Times to-day "Empire First" writes to The Times to-day:
"Perhaps the opinion of an overseas person, resident for the time being in London, on the question now under discussion of Ireland not taking a greater part in this war, in common with the rest of the Empire, may not be out of place. There can be no doubt that in the past Ireland has received much sympathetic support and monetary aid from her friends overseas, who have felt confident that if she received the fair treatment that is accorded to England. who have felt confident that if she received the fair treatment that is accorded to England, Scotland, and Wales, ahe would be just as patriotic as any other part of the King's Empire. Ireland ought to take her stand in common with all of us in this great fight for freedom. Local questions requiring aclution can await more peaceful times, and her allowing them to stand over will prove to those who have confidence in and sympathy with her that their trust has not been misplaced. I have been a supporter of Home Rule Party. I have spoken for Ireland on the platform, and I have Irish blood in my veins. If Ireland fails us now, if our sons who have fought and died for the flag are not to receive from her the support that others are extending, I fear that support that others are extending, I fear that in the future there will be a different feeling towards Ireland than that expressed in the past, and that she will forfeit the good wishes of her many friends in the British Dominions overseas.

MAN-POWER AND PARLIA-MENT.

Times, one of its first duties will be to consider the most urgent of national problems—nuan-power and its distribution for the successful prosecution of the war. So far no decision has been taken on the future of recruiting in Ireland. The Government fully realise the necessity of keeping the Irish Divisions up to strength with a steady stream of Irish recruits, for the sake not only of the Empire, but of Ireland herself. Mr. Duke returned from Ireland to London resteriory, and was able to acquaint his colleagues with his views. It is understood that the Irish Executive favours an immediate voluntary recruiting campaign. This seems to the Government, too, the most expedient policy to pursue for the time, though nothing cam be settled until the return of Mr. Redmond and his followers to Westminster next week. A recruiting campaign without their active and loyal co-operation would be a farce on which the Times, one of its first duties will be to conside co-operation would be a farce on which the Government would not be likely to emback. As to the question of raising the military age, the Government have not seriously considered the proposal, and are not likely to for some IRISHWOMAN'S RETURN.

which immens connoence in its overwhelming artiliery probably greatly contributes. The Englishman also has his physique and training in his favour. It was most striking how the enemy assembled and brought up large bodies of troops in close order into our zone of fire. One must, however, acknowledge the skill with which the English rapidly consolidated the captured positions. The English infantry showed great tenacity in designe. The was especially noticeable in Use case of small parties, which, when once established with mechine guns in a corner of a wood or a group of houses, were difficult to drive out.

Our artillery has become much too formidable to please the German. It was admitted thatartillery, which, apart from this, was numerically far superior to our own. The ammunition has apparently improved considerably. All our tartillery, which, apart from this, was numerically important positions were methodically bombarded by the hughish artillery, as well as an all known infantry and battery positions. Estremely heavy fire was continuously directed on the villages situated immediately behind the firing line, as well as on all natural cover afforded by the glound. Registration and fire control were assisted by well-organised aevisid of the confession that—'On the notes and the confession that—'On the other hand, it is not considered possible to allot these pormanently lounded by the stound and the confession that—'On the other hand, it is not considered possible to allot these pormanently to and as part of, the war establishment of divisions and corps on as large a scale as is required."

In other words, there is a shortage of war maierial. We have leard a lot about the German Staff work, but judging from this captured document there is room for improvement.

After statements by Herr von Jagow and Admiral von Capelle, members of the Centre and Socialist minority party spake.

The Lokalanesiger adia that the debates, which were of a very lively character, turned exclusively on questions which have latterly engrossed public attention. The submarine war is doubtless meant. The prospects of a final agreement are poor, owing to the divergence of views. Admiral von Capelle, who was accompanied by many members of his Staff, joined in the debate several times. Up to the midday interval the Imperial Chanceller had not put in an appearance.

The German newspapers say that the Conservative party in Saxony has presented to the Saxon Diet an extensively-signed petition requesting that the Saxon Ministers of the Interior and Foreign Afairs should state its Committee why they support the Imperial Chancellor's policy, which the petition declares has, up to the present, been detrimental to the interests of the Empire. The potition further demands a ruthless submarine and air war against Great Britain.

The Herimer Tageblatt loarns from well-informed Parliamentary circles that owing to the great secreey which is being observed, but lielle of what has been discussed in the Reichstag Committee has become known to the public, but it is no secret that a great part of the discussions dealt with the submarine and circustion.

THE NEEDS OF SANDYMOUNT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE IRISH TIMES.
SIR,—Sandymount residents suffer from two inconveniences—one, the absence of a public telephone cabinet; the other, the non-existence of a fish and poultry shop. Can the Pembroke Commissioners see their way to secure the former, and some enterprising man supply the latter? In the case of the telephone, one has to try to wake up the owners of shops at midnight in order to telephone for a nurse or doctor. This has happened from time to time in maternity cases, and the waking-up process has not always been successful. In the case of the fish you have to take your chance of meeting a dealer from Ringsend with a donkey and art; this also proves unsuccessful four out of en times. Thirdly—though not a want in the ense of the other two matters—we have no ubble library. Can the Pembroke Commissioners supply it?—Yours, etc.,

Other artists are Hilda and Elnie, Arthur Haynes, Dave Loch and Carrie Lomond, Togo Banzai, Best and Burns, and The Etoiles. The bioscope will give displays at each performance.

Monday, October 16th, at the Theatre Royal.

Dublin. "The French Offensive on the Somme" will be the principal attraction, but, in addition,
it there is a collection of films showing the work of the Allies on all-fronts. "The Rebist Force in Meropolama" is a very attractive subject, and the fiffi is believed to be the only one from that seat of war. "Our Grip on the Huns in East Africa." is the first of the war films from German East Africa, and gives a fine collection of pictures taken in the heart of the enemy country, introducing the heroic operations of the Royal Fusiliers. Views of events in Salonika are shown under the title of "General Sarraii in the East." The famous 4th Royal Irish Fusiliers' band will play selections. In view of the fact that the programme is one of the best yet screened, it is advisable that patrons should book their seats early and avoid disappointments. Booking will open on Monday.
